"Dahling," croaked Mrs. J. Evil Scientist to her horrendous husband, "don't you think it's time we took a trip to Europe? All our friends have gone, and we haven't been there for ages — Middle Ages, to be exact!"

"Yes, it would cheer me up to visit old torture chambers and such," agreed J. Evil. "Let's go and pick up a new car there!"

So the next night, bedecked in stylish black shrouds, Mr. and Mrs. J. Evil Scientist bid good-bye — excuse me, bad-bye — to Junior and left for the Continent.

Climbing aboard their two-seater broom in the middle of a raging thunderstorm, the two travellers flew to a lonely stretch of rocky coast. There they waited for clearer skies before taking off across the ocean for the shores of continental Europe.

Upon their arrival, J. Evil summoned a fiery dragon from the depths of a seaside cave, and he and Goonda continued their journey, landing soon afterwards in a promising-looking junkyard. There, dismissing their monstrous steed with a ghoulish shriek, J. Evil searched feverishly for a new car and soon found a suitable and ancient hearse to convey them all around the countries of Europe with ghostly creaks.

With grim glee, Mr. and Mrs. J. Evil Scientist visited the ruins of Pompeii and the sewers of Paris. They happily passed the hours reading gloomy epitaphs off mossy gravestones in the moonlight, and conversed with assorted vampires, witches, werewolves and ghouls in their local habitats. With equal pleasure, Goonda and J. Evil hovered in the dark and musty corners of museums, admiring vicious medieval weapons and re-constructed torture chambers.

Then they began their nighttime tours of ancient castles. Gliding stealthily along shadowy battlements, down drafty corridors, and across cavernous halls, J. Evil and his wife thrilled to every creak and clank. But stopping to chat with some friendly ghosts, they were soon grievously informed how much things had changed since the Middle Ages.

"Gone are the dens of fierce lions. Gone are the chains and guillotines. Gone are the vicious watchdogs!" wailed one ghost.

"Everything's so modernized," moaned another spectral voice. "Castles are turned into hotels, nowadays," he shuddered, "with swimming pools and golf courses!"

"And what's worse," whimpered a third ghost, "the sound of laughter echoes through the hallways and courtyards. It's hard to find a decent place to live!"

"How dreadful!" sympathized Goonda. "We really must do something for you."

So Goonda and J. Evil embarked on a new quest. For nights on end they drove their hearse all over Europe searching for a remote medieval castle, untouched by the revolting influences of the twentieth century. At last, led on by gruesome instincts, they found the dank ruins of an ancient fortress atop a rockbound cliff, overlooking a murky lake. Here was a dwelling place for all the ghosts of Europe who wanted a good, old-fashioned home! Here they could roam contentedly up and down broken stairways of slimy rock, flit across the stagnant moat for picnics in the gloomy forest, and rest with silent skeletons in the damp, dirty corners of a black dungeon.

"You've made life worth living — if you will pardon the expression," shrieked one old ghost. "How can we ever thank you?"

"Just reserve us a space in the dungeon," requested Goonda, "so we can bring Junior here for a holiday." Then turning to J. Evil with a satisfied grimace, she said, "This trip to Europe has been a wonderful success, dear. Just look at the perfectly lovely summer home we've found!"
